On the morning of April twentieth Fidel Castro's army was busy in the Bay of Pigs area, killing or capturing the pathetic remnants of the American-supported Cuban invasion force. That morning, when President Kennedy rose to address a meeting of newspaper editors in Washington, he was in a grim, unsmiling mood.

"There are from the lessons for us all to be still obscure. Some are clear."

What lessons? And have we learned them? Those questions are answered. For the was something done. The symmetry of the whole Cuban invasion was broken by this. The President, by his action, without exception, had shown that the invasion was through the hands of the
